Today, the HoChunk language is a living language. Every day our modern world changes and many new objects, people and concepts are invented or appear in our everyday life. Although these objects, people and concepts non-exist in our ancestors lifetime they are now currently around us in our everyday life. For our language to grow and to reflect on our modern day world, our tribal fluent speakers and veterans adopted new terms to the HoChunk language. Doing so, our language team will begin incorporating these in our daily instruction. Here is the first part of the new words adopted to the HoChunk language in 2017.

He said the tribe briefly discussed what programs, except for the internet technology, would receive funding. A contingency plan, describing what services would be provided if a shutdown occurred, had been drafted. The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services issued a shutdown contingency plan, describing what services would be provided if a shutdown occurred, had been drafted. The National Indian Health Board sounded the alarm prior to the government shutdown, saying tribal health care was being delayed, funding new continuing resolution or a budget bill was passed. About 200,000 federal employees were furloughed. The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services issued a shutdown contingency plan, describing what services would be provided if a shutdown occurred, had been drafted. Larry Voegele, CEO of the tribe’s health department, said the tribe had enough reserve funding, primarily built up through collection of insurance payments, to keep its health care facilities open. “It’s not a terrible situation for us,” he said, shortly before the end of the shutdown. “I suppose if the shutdown went a really long time and it drained our resources we would possibly have to make some hard decisions, but we’re not anywhere near that point.”

Voegele said the Ponca Tribe currently operates all aspects of its health care programs, except for the internet technology, needed to run those programs. He said the tribe briefly discussed what might happen if the shutdown had lasted for several months and eventually depleting its health funding reserves. “Even if we ran out of that, we could get a loan to help cover these expenses in the meantime,” he said.

He said the shutdown likely wouldn’t have any major lasting effects on the reservation as the tribe was considering the Poncas should be able to get reimbursed for the expenses incurred during the shutdown by claimants of the tribe. Voegele said he is more concerned that Congress make improvements to Indian health care. In November, Sen. Tom Udall and Rep. Raúl Roybal-Logan, both Democrats, introduced legislation in both houses of Congress to increase funding for urban Indian health care programs. S.240, the Urban Indian Health Parity Act, would ensure urban Indian health facilities receive the same reimbursement rates for Medicaid patients as urban and tribally run facilities.

Congressional leaders from New Mexico are seeking to make other improvements to Indian health care. “It’s not a terrible situation for us,” he said, shortly before the end of the shutdown. “I suppose if the shutdown went a really long time and it drained our resources we would possibly have to make some hard decisions, but we’re not anywhere near that point.”

Udall, who introduced S.240, said in November, "The federal government has a treaty responsibility to ensure every Native American has access to quality, affordable care — whether they live in an urban community like Albuquerque or Pawnee or a reservation like the Lower Brule Sioux Tribe reservation in South Dakota. The National Indian Health Board has a lot of experience doing and I hope we can continue to provide those kinds of services." he said.

Voegele said the program is one of the many ways the Ponca Tribe serves its Poncas beyond the exam rooms of its two clinics. “It’s something that our staff has a lot of experience doing and we can continue to provide those kinds of services,” he said.
